

because a few Fenian uniforms have been taken from the rooms of the Head Centre, and the apartments advertised to let. We have no foreboding evidence of another Fenian movement at present, and we cannot believe that one is contemplated. However, if they have given us the slip and should suddenly make a dash on some unprotected point on the Canadian frontier, our readers will be informed of it the next morning through a special telegram to the Herald.

Theoretical Ring.
Some ten or twelve years ago a police ring was formed with the intention of blackmailing every one who had the misfortune to be arrested, whether justly or unjustly, and the reporters of several of the city papers were drawn into it. As soon as the fact came to our knowledge we determined to break it down, and by continually changing our reporter at the police headquarters we succeeded in doing it.

Previously just such a ring has been got up in connection with our theatres, and the dramatic writer who refuses to be blackmailed by it has got to pay the penalty either in the rejection of his piece by the manager or by having a number of newspapers leagued against him. The combination is effected in this way: A certain dramatist, or, more properly speaking, an adapter of pieces, discharges the functions of critic to some five or six evening and Sunday papers. The moment a new piece is in the market this person offers his services for a consideration to the author, and if they are refused he threatens him with his hostility. So far as his influence goes this is unsparingly exhibited; but as he cannot out-argue the theatres, he resorts to the use of his pen. He should not, perhaps, notice the thing if this person, in obtaining the management of concerts and other entertainments, did not assure the unfortunate artists whom he deludes that he has means of getting favorable notices in our columns. So far as this from being the fact that the tickets which he sends us are invariably returned to him, and we refuse to recognize him in any way. We should, moreover, immediately dismiss from our employment any one who was known to have any connection with him. In the same ring with this individual are to be found the critics of some of the daily papers—like him, playwrights and leeches on the managers. The effect of all this is, we need not say, to lower the standard of criticism, as well as to degrade the theatres themselves. We shall break down this ring, just as we have broken down the various other similar combinations that have been set up for the purpose of plunder. We have no notion of allowing three or four needy literary adventurers thus to assume the control of our city amusements, to the great injury of the public and shame of the profession to which they chance to belong.
